Master of Science in Child, Youth, and Family Studies

Elevate your knowledge and skills to bring more hope to children and families.

The demand for caring individuals with the knowledge and credentials required to assist needy children and families is always growing. This Master in Child, Youth, and Family Studies equips you to better the lives of those in need. You will gain insight and experience in the field, gain the knowledge needed for leadership roles, and learn procedure and policy – all while developing your career and focusing on children, youth, and families.

You'll learn how to:

- Analyze youth policies and best practices
- Apply principles and practices in program leadership, management, and evaluation
- Analyze child and youth development, exceptionalities, and sociocultural context
- Examine multiple influences that impact child and youth development and family interactions including race, ethnicity, gender, socioeconomic, and cross-cultural issues

Master of Science in Human Services

Give your career the edge it needs to lay a strong foundation in a child's life.

Gain an edge on serving and leading teams for the good. Make a positive difference whether you want to work directly with people in need, lead others, or work to support service organizations through funding and outreach. In this master's program, you'll gain an in-depth understanding of central issues in human services organizations and the ethical standards for working with diverse populations.

You'll learn how to:

- Analyze the role of professional and ethical standards in human services
- Communicate effectively through writing, visual, and public presentations
- Achieve a level of knowledge across disciplines that will prepare you for a career in human services administration
